

Is there Racial Injustice in Health Outcomes in Southeastern America?

Sabina Iltis | GIS Spring 2019

Abstract

Race has historically been a barrier to adequate medical care, both in proportionally discriminatory laws and through a history of discrimination that has resulted in a higher rate of black poverty than the general poverty rate. In this analysis, I have sought to discover whether the barriers to access to healthcare for left black populations with a structural disadvantage in seeking healthcare by looking for a spatial correlation between counties with poor healthcare outcomes and counties with a higher percentage of black residents.

Results

Counties with higher black populations than the average have poorer health outcomes than those with black populations lower than the average.

A regression analysis reveals that while there is a positive relationship between race and healthcare outcomes, the relationship is fairly weak, with an  $R^2$  value of 0.22.

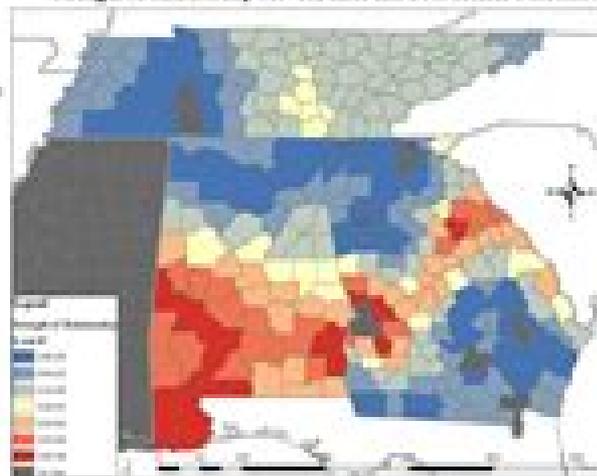

A regression analysis that factors in poverty again reveals a weak positive relationship between racial poverty and healthcare outcomes, with an  $R^2$  value of 0.22.

However, while the overall relationship between race, racial poverty and healthcare outcomes were fairly weak, a geographically weighted regression<sup>1</sup> reveals that there was a fair bit of strong/local effects of both race and racial poverty on health outcomes in central Georgia and southern Alabama, with local  $R^2$  values between 0.60 and 0.71.

Strength of Relationship between Race and Poor Health Outcomes

Methods

The Health Outcomes Index was calculated using data on years of potential life lost, percentage of adults reporting poor health, number of poor physical and mental health days reported in the past 30 days, and low birthweight. The data was sourced from CDC data and the Behavioral Risk Factor Surveillance System.

Strength of Relationship between Racial Poverty and Poor Health Outcomes

Conclusions

While the results do not show that there is a strong relationship between race and poor health outcomes, there is an impact through racial Georgia and southern Alabama that shows a strong relationship between poor health outcomes and race. Further research would require the incorporation of other factors that may affect the spatial relationship between race and poor healthcare outcomes, such as farming in poorer areas and Medicaid usage. Additionally, this analysis was done on the county level, and an analysis done using census tracts or block groups may result in a stronger relationship.
