Evaluating Health Education and Risk Reduction Projects

This chapter focuses on CDC's new direct grants program to fund health education/risk reduction projects of community-based organizations (CBOs). In the past, CDC's Center for Prevention Services (CPS) has provided funding to CBOs via two mechanisms: cooperative agreements with states and a cooperative agreement with the U.S. Conference of Mayors. Now CPS is poised to launch a program that will directly fund CBOs. The national objectives for the CBO projects are the same as those for CDC's counseling and testing program: behavior change, surveillance, and public education (CDC, 1988). An additional purpose for direct funding to CBOs is to reach hard-to-reach groups.

Evaluation of community-based projects presents both conceptual and practical problems that are quite different from those encountered in evaluating the media campaign or the HIV testing and counseling program. The major conceptual difficulty arises from the diversity of the activities that are offered by the projects; the major practical difficulty is the present scarcity of comprehensive information describing the projects themselves.

BACKGROUND AND OBJECTIVES

The traditional CPS instrument for implementing its funding priorities is a state cooperative agreement.¹ Since 1985, when agreements for funding

¹ For specific and well-defined products, CDC has occasionally executed cooperative agreements with professional organizations such as the American Public Health Association, the U.S. Conference of Local Health Officers, the National Association of County Health Officers and the Association of Teachers of Prevention Medicine.
