

The importance of enzymes in the functioning of different cells, tissues and organs.

The human digestive system is made up of a long muscular tube and its associated glands which produce enzymes that hydrolyse large molecules into small ones that can be absorbed into the blood. Food first enters the mouth and is physically broken down by teeth but also is mixed with saliva which contains salivary amylase- secreted from the salivary glands near the mouth and connected via a duct. Salivary amylase starts hydrolysing alternate glycosidic bonds of starch molecules in the food to the disaccharide- maltose. It also contains mineral salts that help buffer the solution to maintain a neutral pH- optimum for salivary amylase to work at to prevent becoming denatured. The food is swallowed and enters the stomach, where the conditions are acidic. The acid denatures the amylase and prevents further hydrolysis of the starch. After a time the food is passed into the small intestine where it mixes with the secretion from the pancreas called pancreatic juice. Pancreatic juice contains pancreatic amylase. This continues the hydrolysis of any remaining starch to maltose. Alkaline salts are produced by both the pancreas and the intestinal wall to maintain the pH at about neutral so that the amylase can function. Muscles in the intestine wall push food along the ileum, compressing maltose molecules against the epithelial lining that produces the disaccharidase-maltase. Maltase is not released into the lumen of the ileum but is part of the cell-surface membranes of the epithelial cells that line the ileum. It is therefore referred to as a membrane-bound disaccharidase. The maltase hydrolyses the maltose into alpha glucose. The alpha glucose molecules are then the correct shape to be complementary to a carrier protein or co-transport protein to bind and move out of the ileum and diffuse into capillaries/blood.

Enzymes are important in the replication of the HIV virus. Following infection, HIV enters the bloodstream and circulates around the body. A protein on the HIV readily binds to the CD4 protein which occurs on a number of different cells, however HIV most frequently attaches to this protein on helper T cells. The protein capsid fuses with the cell-surface membrane. The RNA and enzymes of HIV- reverse transcriptase and DNA integrase enter the helper T-cell. The HIV reverse transcriptase converts the viral RNA into DNA. The newly made DNA is moved into the helper T cells nucleus where it is inserted into the cell's DNA by DNA integrase. The cell then converts its DNA into mRNA using RNA polymerase, however this mRNA contains the codons for making new viral proteins and the RNA to go into the new HIV virus. The mRNA diffuses out of the nucleus through a nuclear pore and diffuses to a ribosome where it attaches at the starting codon and complimentary anticodons on tRNA bind to the mRNA, each of which is carrying a specific amino acid. The amino acids are joined by a peptide bond using an enzyme and ATP. When the ribosome reaches a stop codon, the mRNA and the last tRNA molecule all separate and the polypeptide chain is complete. This occurs many times until all of the new viral proteins (including reverse transcriptase and integrase) and RNA are produced and the HIV particles break away from the helper T cell with a piece of its cell-surface membrane surrounding them- forming their lipid envelope. Therefore, enzymes in HIV such as reverse transcriptase and DNA integrase are very important in the replication of HIV viruses in hosts.

The enzyme acetylcholine is very important in the functioning of a cholinergic synapse. When an action arrives at the end of the presynaptic neurone, this causes calcium ion protein channels to open and calcium ions to enter the synaptic knob by facilitated diffusion. The influx of calcium ions into the presynaptic neurone causes synaptic vesicles to fuse with the presynaptic membrane, releasing acetylcholine into the synaptic cleft. Acetylcholine molecules diffuse across the narrow synaptic cleft very quickly because the diffusion pathway is short. Acetylcholine then binds to receptor sites on sodium ion protein channels in the membrane of the post synaptic neurone. This causes the sodium ion protein channels to open, allowing sodium ions to diffuse in
