Introduction

The industrial revolution is one of the most significant changes that took place between 1789-1914. This period has been divided into various stages by various historians. The French Revolution and Napoleon characterize 1789-1815, 1815-1848, brought in a period of reaction and adjustment, 1848-1871 was described by the round revolution and the unification of the German and Italian nations while the age of imperialism took place between 1871-1914 (Lucassen, 2009). The industrial revolution in Europe significantly contributed to the structural changes experienced socially, politically, and economically.

Economic Effects

Between the 1790s and 1849, a vast economic transformation and commercial expansion were experienced. Initially, Europeans were happy about the political news that was generated by the French Revolution and the ensuing Napoleonic Wars (Kim & Kim, 2017). Tremendous population growth was facilitated by the availability of enough food crops and reduction of diseases. Other changes were experienced in the commercial sector and in various areas. However, some people took advantage of others; for instance, well-founded farmers increased their landholdings after grabbing from the inferior farmers. Products from these lands were sold in the urban market, while urban merchants sponsored the rural producers in providing cloths and threads. The European social structure changed with two groups emerging, such as people from rural and others from urban or owners and non-owners. For example, craft men started treating their fellow men as laborers; thus, the introduction of slavery. Due to these changes, at the end of the 18th century, people from the rural could afford new clothing while those from urban middle classes could afford to provide books and other educational toys to their children. Transportation demands increased due to increased production; therefore, there was a need to move products from one place to another. Learned from the British innovations, steam engines were incorporated, and between 1800 and 1840, there was oceanic transportation. Railways were also included to get coal from mines (Kim & Kim, 2017). The communication sector was improved through the invention of the telegraph, which facilitated the faster exchange of information.

Social Upheaval

Generally, life changes with work being redefined, where workers in the factories were mostly affected. Workers had limited freedom in those factories where they were not allowed to be "idle" in any way. The incorporated machines set the pace for the workers in the factories, and they were supposed to keep up. Work was redefined as being fast, coordinated, and intense, with no distraction allowed. Were not only the laborers in the factories affected but also others in different sectors. It was not strange to incorporate women and children in less-skilled operations, but they were weird as they would work outside their homes and exposed to dangerous and unprotected machines. A new work ethic was introduced, stating that, however, worked should prosper, and
