

machine gun on a forward-facing turret between the driver and commander with the turret light which would obscure its presence having been removed.

Although an armature had been signed, the war was not technically over, and the Austrians would accompany the Allied army of occupation into the city of Rome to ensure compliance of the local population. By January 1918, the Canadian Trenches started withdrawing from occupied Germany (handing control over to the British T Corps) and began the long trip back to Canada. The Austrians were taken back to Great Britain where they were placed in storage. There they remained until 1918, when two were shipped to Canada with the Winnipeg militia and the other eventually going to Montreal to become a tank which would be handed over to the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, where it remains to this day.

Illustration 1. This photo is probably taken after the war and may represent a tractor wearing a German camouflage pattern.

MARKINGS

The markings and colour scheme applied to the Austrians changed after their arrival in France. The markings on the surviving Austro are not entirely representative of those that were on the Austrians in active service.

When the Austrians were first delivered from the factory, they were painted grey and each machine received a distinctive identification number. On the rear lower armour plate was the marking:

F. A. M. G. SYSTEM
A. BATTERY
No. 8.

(The 8 representing numbers 1-8 of the armoured unit.)

The War Department changed the base colour of mechanical transport from grey to 'olive drab' (a dark green) at the end of 1914 to early 1915. As with all mechanical transport delivered to France, the Austrians received a communication War Department issue identification number that was painted on the front and rear lower armour. The front panel laid down to protect the radiator assembly, and when in this position the number of the vehicle was painted on the front of which numbers were issued to the Austrians, but photographs show different runs both numbers 5798, 5799, 5799, 5799, 5799 with 5798 being issued to an armoured support Austro.

The surviving armoured Austro (which is marked number 5799) has markings on the front armour and the left of the rear armour the number of the 17 Motor Machine Gun Brigade - a white square within which is a red arrow pointing to the right over an orange triangle. The same markings can be seen on the front armour of the Austro participated in the Battle of Vimy parade in November 1918. This machine is not seen on any other Austro photographed during the war, although in August 1918 Austro 5794 was photographed with a white rectangle containing an arrow pointing to the right inside on its rear armour, while Austro 5797 has just a white rectangle in the centre of the front armour. Was this an authorized marking when the Austro was called into action, perhaps?

On the top right hand corner of the upper front armour and to the right of the rear number was the Canadian Corps marking of three white letters 'C' within a white triangle. The only other marking that can be seen appears to be an unofficial name painted on the rear wooden body support beneath the armour. Number 5798 has the name 'AKS', while 5799 has the name 'HHL', which possibly may have something to do with identifying them as part of A or H batteries.
