Vicky Phares and Bruce E. Compas

When we first began compiling a review of the literature concerning fathers and developmentals psychopathology several years ago, a colleague stated that fathers do not have an impact on children's lives because fathers spend so little time with their children. Although it may be true that many children do not have contact with their fathers, the majority of U.S. children under the age of 18 have some contact with their biological fathers and often with stepfathers.<sup>1</sup> In addition, fathers make a genetic contribution to their children's functioning regardless of their presence. Interest in the contributions of fathers to their children's development is evident in the attention that fathers have received in the research literature on normative developmental processes. The same cannot be said, however, for the research literature on developmental psychopathology.

Throughout research on developmental psychopathology, mothers have been "blamed" for their children's and adolescents' psychological problems.<sup>2</sup> The tendency to hold mothers responsible for their children's problems has been accompanied by a lack of attention to the roles of fathers in their children's and adolescents' psychological maladjustment.<sup>3</sup> The exclusion of fathers from research on developmental psychopathology is attributable to several factors, including practical issues of participant recruitment, differential base rates of paternal versus maternal psychopathology, theory-driven research based on sexist theories, and research assumptions based on outdated societal norms.<sup>4</sup> Although these reasons may help explain the lack of research on fathers and developmental psychopathology, these reasons do not justify the continued lack of attention.

Despite relative inattention to fathers, a growing body of literature has more investigated paternal influences on child and adolescent psychopathology. In a review of the empirical research literature on developmental psychopathology from 1994 to 1995 of child and adolescent studies involving parents, we found that 48% of the studies included mothers only, 25% included mothers and fathers but analyzed only for "maternal" effects without separate analyses for maternal and paternal effects, 26% included mothers and fathers and analyzed them separately, and 1% focused exclusively on fathers.<sup>5</sup> The findings from the studies that included mothers and fathers and analyzed them separately, as well as the studies that included fathers only, are reviewed here in relation to four basic questions about fathers and developmental psychopathology: Do fathers contribute to child and adolescent psychopathology? Are paternal effects limited to certain types of problems in children and adolescents? Are paternal effects limited to certain behaviors or disorders of fathers? What mechanisms are responsible for paternal effects that are found in addition to the discussion of these four questions; future directions of research on fathers and developmental psychopathology are outlined.

DO FATHERS CONTRIBUTE TO CHILD AND ADOLESCENT PSYCHOPATHOLOGY?

Research on parental influences in developmental psychopathology has relied on three basic methodologies that are based on the target population of the research. Our review is organized around these three target population samples of clinically referred or diagnosed children and characteristics of their fathers: samples of clinically referred or diagnosed fathers and characteristics of their children, and nonreferred samples of fathers and their children.

Fathers of Diagnosed or Clinically Referred Children

In this approach, investigators target children who have been diagnosed with psychiatric disorders or referred for clinical services and compare the functioning of the fathers and the mothers of these children, compare the fathers of these children with fathers of nonreferred children, and compare the characteristics of fathers of children with different diagnoses. Paternal influences have been investigated for a variety of disorders of childhood and adolescence, including disorders that are internalizing or overcontrolled, such as depression, suicidality, and anxiety, as well as disorders that are externalizing or undercontrolled, such as attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD), conduct disorder, and substance abuse.

The number of studies we found in our survey varied from 13 investigations of fathers of children diag-
